"I believe that in some countries (like China), the government is able to dictate what internet users have access to. And, the punishment if one is "caught" accessing a "forbidden" site is...well, who knows? This is America, and free speech is one of the main tenents of our government, is it not? “As an Internet Network Engineer, I know first hand what a mess there would be for everyone by not having Net neutrality. There would be isolated communities and classes of users, not always able to communicate with each other. There would be one class for big corporations, another for people with lots of $$$, turf wars, bans on device types... a real mess. The US messed up the cell phone market this way, before and this, in actuality is an extension. Let’s do some analysis and planning for once, set standards and keep this resource OPEN!”

"As a working computer professional and someone who works in a small business, it would both be inappropriate and economically hurtful to allow big corporations to have the right to regulate traffic. At best, moves to block net neutrality are an endorsement of monopolies and anti-competitive (companies would be able to block free and fast access to their competition, or to companies that do not advertise with them or have a ridiculously high budget). At worst, blocking net neutrality is censorship pure and simple. I highly doubt that the United States wants itself to be seen as a country that endorses policies similar to those officially implemented by countries such as China, and as your constituent I would oppose any such move. Again, I urge you to endorse and support HR 5353, net neutrality, and all similar legislation."

“I feel very strongly that Internet providers and telephone companies should be prohibited from interfering with the use of the Internet by their customers based on content or for any other reason. Federal laws should protect the privacy and freedom of expression of Internet users. I use the Internet daily in my work for a local government, as an adjunct professor at a local university and and also at home to do research, banking, and to receive news and information from non-profit, charitable and political organizations. I use it to stay informed on current issues. Corporations should not have the ability to interfere with the use of this important communication tool by the general public and individual citizens and residents in the United States. The federal government has asserted that communication channels belong to the public. The federal government has a duty to protect the public from interference with Internet communications, just as they protect the use of the U.S. Mail and the telephone. ”

"I do understand that some of things like video and music downloads take much more bandwidth than email and web browsing. However, the providers of Internet content are already paying for bandwidth usage and they should be the ones that pay for the additional bandwidth that these services require. I also know P2P does make a user a provider of sorts and I would not object to a REASONABLE charge for this if the base rates for high speed access were more in line with what most of the rest of the developed world is paying. However, the ISP's must be treated very much like a common carrier and be required to carry the content without discrimination."

"Don't side with the big phone and cable companies, we don't need this kind of censorship. The Internet is one of the best things we have going for us—we don't need AT&T, Verizon, Comcast and Time Warner to block sites they disagree with in favor of sites and services THEY prefer. Let us make that choice. FCC can protect us!"

“Trust me, people will notice the difference between a free and open internet and a corporate controlled one. And they will wonder who ruined their internet. And it won’t be hard to figure out who’s to blame. I really don’t know that much about your guiding philosophies, but you do strike me as a decent and honorable public servant. I’d really like to be right; please tell the conglomerates where they can stick it.”
